SAFE USE OF ELECTRICITY.

Just as the monsoon finds the weak spots in a building, so also it discovers the unsuspected weaknesses in an electrical installation.

The risk of electric shock in the home only arises from some fault which has occurred, either in the wiring installation or in the appliance in use.

This risk arises when any metal case or covering of an electric fitting or appliance comes in contact with a conductor owing to breakdown of the insulation which is provided to protect the parts that carry the current or when the covering of the electric wiring has so deteriorated in use that it no longer serves the purpose for which it was provided, viz., to insulate the current-carrying conductors. Dampness, by assisting the flow of current, increases these risks, so that extra precautions should be taken wherever moisture comes into contact with electricity.

An electric installation, which may appear to be safe during the dry season, may develop leakage and danger of shocks as soon as monsoon conditions begin. Therefore—

"have your installation tested by a licensed electrical contractor at least once a year, at the beginning of the monsoon, to ensure that it is good condition, in the interests of the safety of persons and property."
